Clifford Chance Customer Success Story

The Goal

At the very largest law firms, document assembly is now the norm. Clifford Chance has used Thomson Reuters Contract Express since 2001, when it replaced an inefficient system of many different manual templates.

“Before,” says Gail Swaffield, Knowledge Management Specialist, “we had a number of document templates on the same theme, which was inefficient to maintain. Now, our lawyers need to answer just a single set of questions to get their new variation of the document. As well as the obvious time savings for them, it means our document specialists can devote their time to adding more richness and value to the templates rather than managing multiple versions.”

The Solution

A key benefit for Clifford Chance is simplicity. In the past, when they needed multiple documents, lawyers had to apply the same concepts across maybe five or six templates. Now, one interview populates several documents with the same information. This keeps work consistent too, ensuring that answers are applied across a complete set of documentation in the same way. Plus it adds an important layer of risk management, removing the potential for errors that might occur if the same comments were made manually across a set of several documents. There is still a degree of manual work needed in the fine customisation of documents, but the nitty-gritty amendments – for example changing ‘borrower’ to ‘borrowers’ or ‘has’ to ‘had’ are all automated.

The Result

As Gail Swaffield notes, this way of working is now the norm at Clifford Chance. “Document automation is now the standard for us. The key value is efficiency – the fact that our lawyers can get to a first draft so much more quickly and that both they and our document specialists are freed to focus on more interesting and more valuable work. Then, of course, there’s the consistency, and the part the technology has to play in managing risk.”

While in Swaffield’s view, document automation technology has progressed as far as it can for large law firms, Clifford Chance is still making incremental improvements to its capability together with the Contract Express team. For example the firm can now ‘round trip’ documents, making manual changes after the first draft then sending the document back through the Contract Express questionnaire, which keeps it ‘live’ in the system for longer, with all the benefits of control and consistency.

“The key value is efficiency – our lawyers can get to a first draft so much more quickly and they are freed to focus on more interesting and more valuable work”
